Plaintiff's Testimony. The plaintiff, Loretto Roma, who uses crutches, as his left leg is off above the knee, was the last witness put on the stand before Attorney Comstock closed his case. He testified that he had been working for the Climax company for three weeks and that on May 13, 1912, he was told by the foreman to go from the top floor to the cellar to get some paper. This was just as the noon whistle blew. After eating his dinner, tried to find the paper in the cellar, but could not find any, and he then went to the next floor of the mill

He said he saw the elevator moving up slowly and when he got on the elevator gave a jump and he was thrown on to the floor of the elevator so that his feet and legs protruded over the edge and were caught and crushed when the elevator reached the floor above. One leg was so badly crushed that it had to be amputated above the On cross examination by Attorney

Avery, the witness was asked about various points in his testimony on the trial of the case against the Climax He denied that he had testified in the way that the attorney inquired about, saying that the interpreter at that trial misunderstood. He claimed on one point that what he said was that it was the elevator that jumped and Stanton, Norwich and prohibiting employes from using it except for moving heavy articles of freight. The notice was signed by the Thames River Specialties company.

Foreman Chagnon said that he had notified employes not to use the elevator unless they were carrying freight. Once he saw Loretto Roma coming up on the elevator with a pall of mortar and the foreman told Roma not to use the elevator that way any more, and also called Roma's brother Joe to tell Loretto so that he should understand. The foreman said Loretto had never complained to him about the elevator jumping.

The foreman contradicted Roma's testimony that he had been instructed by the foreman to go after some paper at the time of the accident.
